Don't allow uninvited "workers" into your home

Consumers are warned to watch out for people claiming to be utility workers who arrive without an appointment at your front door and say they need to check some wires in your house.

Protect yourself by verifying whether someone has a reason to be on your property before opening your door. If you have not called a utility company or a utility company has not contacted you before the "worker" arrived at your door, this should signal a red flag.

Wise consumers know to always check workers' credentials. Never let anyone into your home without first asking for identification.

Representatives of utility companies and other reputable businesses will have proper identification. When in doubt, look up the company's phone number and call to verify the identity of the worker. If you encounter a suspicious utility worker, say "no," close the door and call local authorities immediately.
